

FACHSPRACHE news November 2018

Dear Readers,

We would like to update you on recent developments of our journal. Since 2018, "Fachsprache" has also developed into an e-journal. The publishing house and the editorial team are working hand in hand to continuously improve the review and publication processes, helping to increase the international and broad professional recognition of the journal. Therefore, "Fachsprache" has changed its subtitle and is now called "Fachsprache. Journal of Professional and Scientific Communication".

The German main title is kept to express our loyalty to the decade-old tradition of research into languages for specific purposes and to express our appreciation for these initiating linguistic research approaches. The new subtitle remains international, but in light of the diversity of languages and authors of the journal, we do not need to express this explicitly. The new subtitle is intended to underline that the journal has a wide thematic and discipline base (areas of interest include aspects of terminology research, variational linguistics and LSP didactics). Moreover, contributions will also continue and increasingly focus on pragmatilistic, discourse-linguistic, media and communicative science perspectives on language and communication in the workplace as well as on the internal and external science communication. Furthermore, in order to support the introduction and implementation of the new citation method, all published articles will in future have a clear citation reference on the title page.

We would also like to inform you about a change in our editorial team. Unfortunately, our colleague Prof. Dr. Hanna Risku has to withdraw from the editorial team for reasons of increasing professional duties. We would like to thank Hanna for her many years of excellent, constructive and cheerful cooperation! At the same time, we like to warmly welcome Prof. Dr. Merja Koskela from the University of Vaasa (Finland) as a new member of our editorial team. Merja is a valuable addition to our team with new key areas of research and language skills. We are looking forward to working with her!
